SALES IN MAILS

Wag Slips Shirt Into Post-office With an Explanatory Note.

A wag there was and he loved a joke even as you and I. He read a tale of an airship flight, one which took place in the dead of night and he read the tale of a shirt. The tale he found and a tale he went off of an aviator's shirt. * * * Sounds like Woodard Kindling, but it is true nevertheless.

Somebody that has been reading about El Paso aviators wrote this touching effusion, pinned it on a perfectly good white shirt and mailed it to The Herald in a Taft-Diaz envelope.

The postoffice clerks did not sail into the air because they knew not what the envelope contained, but, maintaining their equilibrium, deposited it with other important mail in the Herald box at the postoffice. It was delivered postage due and if the inventor of this most up-to-date flying machine has lost his valuable airship model, he can secure same by applying at The Herald office.

The riddle is tucked in a drawer in the safety deposit vault so no one will steal it and secure a patent without the consent of the inventive genius of the El Paso boy. If he doesn't call soon, he will find it hanging on the line.

The model is marked: "The Original Stanton aeroplane."

The Thief Detective Service Co.
